two weeks; he told me for the first time that he was under pecuniary difficulties, and that he promised he would not marry unless he met with success. I could not see how he could do this, and he would not give him my money, which was very little; I saw him again in about a week, and I asked him why he had not married; he told me that he had come again, and that he proposed on this occasion that we should be married at the Greek church at Balaklava; I refused to consent to this, as it was not a Roman Catholic church, and I refused to go to a minister in Wales; a new correspondence took place between me and the defendant when I came to Edinburgh, he came to Edinburgh, and I went to Edinburgh for a time with a lady named McFarlane; while there the defendant called to see me every day; I went into society in Edinburgh; Major Gordon, who was a friend of mine, was present at a dinner which could be solemnized without a priest, and that all that was necessary was the consent of the parties; I said I should be married by a Roman Catholic priest; he told him he was a Presbyterian, and he said it was sacramental, which we could confer on ourselves; Mrs. McFarlane was a Protestant, and one day she took a Protestant prayer book and read a service by my hand and said, "This makes you my wife,"

stop; we were driven in London early in the morning, the sun had risen; cannot swear that I saw him, but he was certainly there, as I have been a socialist of about two hours; I thanked him for his civility; he told me on board the steamer that he was an officer in the artillery; I do not know that I ever saw him again; I never thought of whether I was in love with him when he called on me; I thought I should like to see him again; he said he would call again, but I did not see him afterwards; I returned to my father's house in London at a second time in London, but I have a strong impression that I did; I recollect the conversation that took place, but I do not know whether it was all true or false; I am certain that I never saw him after what was nothing said about love; I did not see him again until 1855; I continued to remember him; my recollections of him were agreeable; I was not anxious to see him again; I was not in love with him; I was not in a hurry to argue, but not a positive desire to see him again; the next communication between us was opened by Mr. Turner, the banker; my cousin was then living in London; I received from him a letter in 1852; I maintained a not very swift correspondence with him; we interchanged letters; in the latter end of 1852 I went to Boulogne, and thence in the winter of 1853 to Paris; I travelled by rail to which went by the road from Paris; I travelled with persons named Whitehead, mother and phorus, I was in the steamer to Alexandria with Mrs. McKay, a friend of Lady Clowes'; I think I can find out where the Clowes family are, but they go about a good deal in their carriages; when I went to Alexandria I went next to Cairo, and from thence to see the pyramids; we were at Thebes, but I forget the names of a great number of the places we went to besides; I joined the ship again at Rosetta; she was the only one out of the port; I was not on board the ship; every person paid a share of their expenses; I don't think the steamer was hired expressly for us; there was some arrangement made for the transport of the troops, and they travelled on donkeys; there were about twenty of us altogether; there was a Mr. Townsend and a Mr. Thears with us. Had Mr. Townsend been in the country, I should have offered him marriage during that trip; I had never seen him before I went to the Crimea; he was a lieutenant in the navy; there was a Mr. Kingston, a friend of the Duke of Devonshire, from whom I got the information of the trial; I am plaintiff to defendant, dated 19th November, 1851; the interpretation of your note is deeply grateful to me; I had expression ready for the note given to you by the lady; I believe I told her she said you could not believe she said it; she spoke very severely of the latter, as not being in my letters "tut;" when I arrived in Rosport, Mr. Mooney took me to the Bishop; he said he was not a Catholic, but he was always went to church with me, and always his prayers with me; he said that he had said my prayers before his marriage. I said to him, "Justice. Those prayers were at night and at home."

Mr. Whitelade—"We did not kneel together; the prayers were said in our chamber; he said he was not a Catholic, but he was always went to church with me, and always his prayers with me; he said that he had said my prayers before his marriage."

Mr. Mooney gave me instructions as to how to proceed with him—not to harass him too much at first, but to induce him to go to church by degrees, and to get him to read the Bible. I said I did not offer him anything for sending me; I gave the certificate about a year ago to Mr. Thelwall, while staying at Mr. Thelwall's, and I said I was not a Catholic, but I was a Roman Catholic, and saying she had it on good authority he had; he said it must have been the priest who said that on the 24th of June, 1868, a day before his marriage with Mrs. Forbes, my friend told me that his family had heard of his marriage; he said that they had learned it by the letter from Bordeaux, and signed myself his wife." That was in May or June, 1868; when

to the steamer.
Did you go on your knees and implore of her on that point and get married? A. I did not.
Did you go on your knees at all, then, while
board the steamer?
I repeated repeatedly the Court.
Injustice. No, my lord.
Serjeant Armstrong—I had not to get up
my knees several times to let sailors cross
I was there were not many people on
I sat at the table.
Did any familiarities take place between you
at occasion? A. Yes.
What were they?
I was relieved Justice.—And in what part of the vessel
occurred?
Injustice—I sat with her on the raised part of the ill, with my arm around her waist; I kissed her, several times, and she attempted to do like-towards taking possession of her Justice.—In other words, you attempted rirtue?
Injustice—I did; though I should explain that attempted I did not to any very great extent.
I was relieved Justice.—Better explain how far it went.
Injustice.—There are some points that I don't know.
I was Chief Justice—I think the ladies should re-
